

The Descent of Pistis Sophia

A Tale of Loss, Wisdom, and Return to Light

Grace Hassan

I now bring you the Tale of spoken of only in and the hush of old temples.

Her name means she was once light, in the chose to descend. This is not however. It is a tale of love, means to remember who we Long ago, long before minutes and centuries, there Looming Realms." It hung veil of starlight, and there

She was neither something in between; a pistis, a weaver of meaning who could light a soul with a single breath, and sing a thought into form. Sophia was beloved by all, for she spun stories that healed hearts and stitched broken memories whole. But as the ages turned, she began to feel a weight behind her joy, a thread pulled too tight.

She heard whispers, sorrow rising from the lower realms, echoing through the fabric she wove. Suffering, silence, a forgetting so deep it gnawed at the roots of being. So one day, against all warnings, Sophia descended.

She fell, not like a stone, but like a prayer unravelling. Her wings of woven light became rain, her voice lost its tone. By the time she reached the realms of men, she was dust in a womb, memory in the bones of a mortal child, born nameless. She cried just like any infant. No one knew that she had once sung the stars into stillness. She was raised in a village that feared difference, where questions were punished, and silence was survival. But even as she grew and forgot, something shimmered within her. She touched the leaves and heard them breathing. She sang to the river and it answered. Her dreams were filled with cities of light she had never seen, and a sorrow too large for one life to carry.

People called her strange, possessed. She was cast out, blamed for droughts and misfortunes she could not name. So, Sophia wandered.

Years passed. She learned to hide her wonder, to dull her voice. She wept beside beggars and danced with mad women. She tended to the sick and buried the forgotten.

Slowly, a memory began to return. Not of who she had been but why she had come, why she had descended to bring light into the shadow; not with the power but with a presence. One night, in a

Pistis Sophia, a figure half-remembered songs

"weaving wisdom," for upper realms, until she a tale of punishment loss, and what it truly are.

time split itself into was a place called "The above the worlds like a Sophia lived.

goddess nor mortal, but

The Descent of Pistis Sophia A Tale of Loss, Wisdom, and Return to Light Grace Hassan ruined temple where the gods had fled, Sophia stood before a broken mirror.. And in that cracked reflection, she saw it. Her weathered face, mortal. Glowing faintly, from within, she remembered not her name perhaps, but her purpose. She was not here to escape suffering, she was here to accompany it, to be witness in a world that had forgotten how to be seen. And with that, she began to weave again. Not with threads, but with acts of grace; a kind word to a thief, a lullaby for a dying child, a meal shared in silence. And though she remembered, unknown, the world began to change around her. Not with miracles but with remembering, one soul of a time, for from her soul all souls are born with her breath.

So ends the tale of Pistis Sophia and her descent; not a fool but a choice to forget everything, for the chance to love without armor, to walk the earth not as a saviour, but as a thread in its healing tapestry.

We often think wisdom is light, but the deepest wisdom knows how to enter the dark and to stay. Maybe we, like Sophia, learn to descend with grace and remember, even in our forgetting that the thread of purpose is never truly lost.

